Attached is a copy of a brochure addressing on-site inspection. Such things are rare.

In any case, the punchline is on pages 38/39/40. My basic concern remains: if one seeks arms control deals with a very large nation (like the USSR), which is inherently hostile and neurotic about secrecy and deception, why would one want constraints so sweeping (or detailed) that on-site inspection would be a necessary element to the deal's verification and to US perception that our security was safe? (There are answers but they don't make me feel so good.) This tautology continues to lurk behind US arms control theology and--I suspect--it will go on unresolved for a long time. Nonetheless, there are a number of good ideas in here.

If I can assist you more here, please call.
